

With God, all things are possible — and I stand as a living witness to that truth.

This vision placed within me is not small, and it was never meant to be. It stretches beyond comfort, beyond reason, beyond what the world calls realistic. It reaches toward something eternal — a world restored, a humanity lifted, a glimpse of Heaven touching Earth through willing hearts and obedient lives.

I will not shrink this vision to fit the limits of others.
I will rise to meet it.

Every challenge that stands before me already carries its solution. Every barrier holds within it the seed of breakthrough. I do not walk alone in this work — the right people, the right resources, the right moments are already being aligned, even now, in ways I cannot yet see.

My role is to move forward in faith.
To speak when called to speak.
To build when called to build.
To trust when there is no visible path.

I will tell my story — boldly, clearly, and without hesitation — knowing that it is not merely my story, but a call. And those who are meant to hear it will recognize it. They will come. They will give of their minds, their time, their resources, and their hearts. Not by pressure, but by purpose.

This is not my work alone.
This is God's work moving through me.

I release the need to control every detail, and I embrace the discipline to act where I am led. I will be diligent. I will be courageous. I will be relentless in love, in truth, and in vision.

Step by step, person by person, community by community — this world will change.

Not by force.
Not by fear.
But by faith, unity, and divine alignment.

Today, I recommit.

To the vision.
To the calling.
To the work set before me.

I will move forward. I will not delay. I will not doubt what has already been confirmed within me.

With God, all things are possible.
And through Him, this vision will live.
